Lt. Gen C. P. Cabell, the No. 2 man in the U. S. foreign intelligence network, was in Dallas Tuesday, but his mission here was anything but a cloak-and-dagger operation.

Gen. Cabell, who was born and reared in Dallas, was here to visit his brothers, Earle and Ben Cabell, and address the Kiwanis Club of Dallas at their noon meeting.

The general is deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency, the office in charge of co-ordinating the counterintelligence efforts of the armed forces.

ACCOMPANIED BY SON

Traveling with his son, C. P. Cabell, Jr., a second-year cadet at the Military Academy, Gen. Cabell arrived in Dallas Monday aboard a B-25 at Hensley Field.

Young Cabell, the general said, is carrying on a family tradition at West Point.

"Ever since there has been a Military Academy," he said, "there has been a Cabell from each generation to attend."

The general graduated with the class of 1925; his son will be commissioned with the class of 1958.

Gen. Cabell was named the deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency by President Eisenhower in 1953. Prior to the top secret assignment, he was staff director of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"Our office is in charge of all overseas espionage," the general said, but declined further comment on his office's work, except to say it was staffed mostly by civilians.

The general said he would return to Washington following his address.

A Dallas' leading business and civic leaders honored Gen. Cabell Monday night with a reception at the City Club in the Adolphus Tower.

While in Dallas he also attended the Honored Guests Banquet of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.
